with the megaphone. New York, NY : HBO Home Video, 1980. Silent film directors were a flamboyant breed - pioneers who invented the art of film direction as they went along. Working conditions were chaotic. Open sets were built side by side and back to back, and live "mood" music was provided to each star's taste. Despite deafening noise and constant distraction, directors talked their cast through every move and emotion, and from this confusion came great films.

Hollywood, a celebration of the American silent film: Out west. New York, NY : HBO Home Video, 1980. The Old West was still there when the movies arrived. Cowboys and outlaws saw a heaven sent chance to relive their youth - and get paid for it - by working in films. The man who really started the "Western Craze" was the Wild West showman William Cody, who made the Life of Buffalo Bill in 1913. Tom Mix was the next western screen hero, followed by William S. Hart, who dignified the genre with films like Narrow Trail and Tumbleweeds. These films were a celebration of the West, establishing a tradition that continues to this day.

Africa: A History Denied. Classroom ed. Alexandria, Va : Time Life Video & Television, 1995. Sam Waterston. Cloaked in darkness since medieval times, the spectacular ruins of the once dazzling, southern African kingdom of Great Zimbabwe posed a thorny dilemma for white settlers who claimed to have "discovered" the region a mere hundred years before. Refusing to believe the massive, finely hewn stone walls could be the product of native culture, white "experts" eager to claim the land for Europeans credited the ancient city to everyone from wandering Phoenicians to the biblical Queen of Sheba. In so doing, they began a long, insidious European tradition of willful misinterpretation of Africa's past, until, in the ultimate irony, the place where human history began would become a place with no history of its own.
